The information gathered is strictly confidential, made so by law.

Census information can not under any circumstances be used as a basis for taxation, nor can it be used to harm any person or his property.

MANY LIVES ENDANGERED

Thousands of Deaths
Due to Neglected
Colds

Doctors declare that every winter thousands of people needlessly sacrifice themselves to what at first is a simple cold. There is grave danger in allowing a cold to "wear off." It is more often likely to wear away the lungs and start the development of pneumonia or other serious throat or lung trouble. At the first sign of a cold you should start taking Father John's Medicine, which is a doctor's prescription with more than sixty years of success in the treatment of colds and coughs. The gentle laxative effect of Father John's Medicine drives out impurities and the tonic food elements build new health and strength to ward off further attacks of disease. Another important point to remember is that Father John's Medicine is guaranteed free from alcohol or dangerous drugs in any form, so it is a safe medicine for all the family to take.

PREVENTABLE DISEASES.

Preventable diseases cost the United States four billion dollars less in 1917 than it would, had the health conditions of 20 years ago prevailed in 1917. Four hundred thousand less deaths occurred in 1917 than would have had the 1900 death rate prevailed. Annual illness of workers still costs this country two billion dollars each year. One man in every three called by the Army was found to be physically unfit. In 1900 the general death rate from all causes in the United States was 17.80 in 1917, the late figures available, it had been reduced to 14.2. Had the 1900 death rate prevailed in 1917 there would have been in the United States, with an estimated population of 110 million, 390,000 more deaths than actually occurred. The record of other years leaves little room to doubt what may be done in saving life. In 1900 typhoid fever caused a death rate of 35.8 per 100,000 population. In 1917 the rate had been reduced to 13.4. Diphtheria was reduced from 35.4 to 16.5 in the same period. Tuberculosis declined from 190.5 deaths per 100,000 of population in 1900 to 146.4 in 1917. The Public Health Service is led to believe that its health program is feasible owing to the fortunate co-operation and successful termination of the extra cantonment work which was carried on so efficiently by the American Red Cross, State and local health authorities and the U. S. Public Health Service. The lesson taught by this splendid demonstration of team work should not be lost to the country. For this reason, the American Red Cross, which has set aside millions of dollars for health work in the United States, has been asked to take an active part in translating the health program into action. Its thousands of local chapters are counted on to arouse and maintain interest in health work and actively co-operate with Federal, State and local health officers in accordance with the announced policy of the American Red Cross to co-operate with existing health agencies.

The Dear Somebody

By A. MARIA CRAWFORD

(Copyright, 1917, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

Isabella Guilford looked up and down the long rows of tables stretching for one block on Market street. Twenty-five hundred returning soldiers, her townsmen, were to eat there that day. A profusion of early summer flowers, like a gorgeous rainbow in the tropics, spanned the snowy tables.

Over a thousand fried chickens, hundreds of delicately frosted cakes, the pride of many a housewife; sandwiches, pies, everything dear to the doughboy's heart, had been prepared for the feast.

With an ardor born of loneliness Isabella wished that the eyes of one khaki-clad man would brighten at the sight of her, that a dear somebody would hasten to find her, unhappy if she were not there. But she realized all too well that the only soldiers she knew would smile, grasp her hand in differently and pass on to some girl for whom they really cared.

Isabella was thirty, and for some inexplicable reason she had never had a lover. She had numbers of friends, so many that not even the people with whom she was intimate suspected the embarrassing truth that none of the men who called on her and took her about wanted to marry her. Many of her associates looked on the subject, inquiring in feigned sarcastic fashion what she was waiting for, a prince or a millionaire. Isabella had always laughed at such questions, but the laughter was forced.

Ever since the news that twenty-five hundred local members of the great Thirtieth division, which had done some of the hardest fighting, were to parade in their home city on their way to the demobilization camp, she had covertly hoped that she would be asked to serve them. But the committee in charge had decided that the very youngest and prettiest girls should serve the men, while the older ones, like Isabella, could stay in the supply rooms to cut cakes and pies and to prepare the plates as they were needed.

She thought of the story of Mary and Martha in the Bible, and reflected somewhat bitterly that the role of Martha would always fall to her.

From somewhere far off frenzied shouts sounded. Torpedoes placed on the tracks of the incoming trains exploded like the firing of a salute. There was the sound of martial music, and then every whistle, blow and every bell in the city rang, adding to the human din. It was like another armistice day. The boys, their own home boys, had come back to their loved ones at last.

Isabella's eyes grew a bit misty and she dabbed at them uncertainly as she hastened to help the dozens of other workers prepare the feast. Many of the girls and young women, unable to restrain themselves, yelled something excitedly and rushed off toward Gay street, the line of march. So Isabella and the older women, most of them married, generously piled the fried chicken, the pickles and pies on the paper mache plates.

"I'm glad that you're not man crazy, Isabella," said one old lady, gruffly, indignantly because her own share of the work had been disorganized by the unexpected flight of her young helpers.

"You are dependable, the kind of woman who makes a good wife. Now you can keep your head," she ejaculated crisply. She could keep her heart as well as her head, thought Isabella sadly, thinking of her lack of lovers.

Finally the vanguard swung into view at the far end of Market street. The girls were marching with them, waving flags, shrieking their own joy. At sight of the tables, loaded with good things, a lusty cheer broke from the boys.

Isabella left the street and went into the hot, smoky rooms which had been fitted up as temporary kitchens. She handed out plates, she cut cakes and pies until her thumb was sore, but still the demand came for more supplies.

"Run outside, Isabella, and see if anybody could have been overlooked," said one matron.

Many of the soldiers called to her as she passed along the tables, waving their arms and shouting greetings, but Isabella knew that she was not essential to the happiness of any of them.

A captain in the medical corps, a stranger, stood a little apart from the others, and Isabella's heart gave a flutter of pleasure at sight of him. Perhaps she could entertain him, and so feel that she was not an outsider after all. She went up to speak to him, her hand out, a little wistful look of longing to be a real part in the joyful celebration flashing her pretty face.

"Won't you have something else to eat? I don't believe you went out from here, did you? You must have taken Captain Newman's command when he was invalided home six months ago. I am Isabella Guilford."

"So I did, Miss Guilford," smiled the stranger. "I'm from Michigan. Bill Burdette is my name. I was just beginning to feel a bit lonely when you came. By being brigaded with your townsmen I am missing my part of the fun in my own home town. But it's all in the game! And these are wonderful days, compared with the time we spent over there."

As they stood there in the warm sunlight Isabella tried to make herself believe that he had come back to her, that he was glad because she was there beside him. Of course it was foolish, playing make-believe when she was all of thirty; but it was better than being lonely.

All at once Peggy Lucy's visitor dashed up to them and seized Capt. Bill Burdette's hands. "Why, Bill, you blessed thing!" she cried. Then she stood on tiptoe and kissed him. And the young medical officer laughed, held her off at arm's length, and then hugged her very close.

With an odd sinking of the heart Isabella turned away unnoticed and went back to the hot, smoky kitchen. Life was always doing things like that to her. A door through which she glimpsed a dream of happiness would open, a little way and as soon as she started toward it it seemed to close with an ominous click of the lock.

She was just an old maid and she would have to substitute service for self, she concluded. The war had taught her that self-abnegation keeps one from grieving over personal problems. She thought of being a nurse, of going abroad during reconstruction days. There was much that she could do. She was capable. She knew that.

She began scraping the old plates that had held the cakes, piling them in orderly rows on the littered tables. She could hear the soldiers and the girls singing outside, could hear their cries of delight as they bumped into each other, trying to dance on the asphalt paving. The mayor had declared a holiday.

There would be feasting and joyful gatherings all that day, but for her it would be a time of loneliness. Nobody would think of asking her to join their party that day.

"I beg your pardon," a voice said just above her ear, and she turned so quickly that an old plate slid out of her hand and crashed on the rough stone floor. She looked up into the smiling face of the medical officer.

"I hope that you won't think me presumptuous, Miss Guilford. I've hunted all over the place for you. My little cousin is visiting Peggy Lucy here, and when they asked me to go home with them I told them that I had an engagement with you. Now what am I going to do about it? You seem so bright and entertaining, so much like the girl I've always dreamed of meeting that I dare not let her slip through my fingers."

Isabella's heart was beating steadily now, but with all the composure born of love and handed down to every woman through the ages she smiled at him and said in matter-of-fact tones, "I think that I can manage it. We'll slip away and go home now."

She must not be too eager, she must let the male believe himself the hunter, she thought as she pinned on her smart little hat, her fingers suddenly cold and shaking. Life had unexpectedly dealt her the best cards in love's deck. How carefully she must play them!

LEARNED SOME UGLY FACTS

Two Cases Where Eavesdroppers Probably Convinced Themselves of Truth of Old Adage.

A woman who had fallen ill distrustful doctors. So she asked her sister to conceal herself and listen to the conversation between the family doctor and a specialist who were called in consultation. When the specialist joined the family doctor his only remark was:

"Bless my soul, I have never seen so ugly a woman in all my life!"

"Ah, but you should see her sister," said the doctor.

The sister's experience was scarcely as disconcerting as that of a man who was ill, and who desired to know the truth about his condition. According to a contributor to the Sphere, the butler, who had concealed himself at his master's order, reported that there was a disagreement between the two physicians.

"However, it does not matter," reported the butler, "for some fellow whom the specialist called 'Mr. Post Mortem' will settle the matter within two or three days."

Columbus' Tiny Vessels.

The largest of the three ships in which Columbus made his first voyage, the Santa Maria, was about ninety feet long and twenty feet beam, and was of about 150 tons burden. A single deck covered it throughout. It had three masts, one supporting a triangular lateen sail, which was more picturesque than serviceable for an ocean voyage. The vessel was about the size of one of our modern coasting schooners. The Pinta was somewhat smaller, and the Nina, Spanish for baby, was well named, being scarcely larger than a galloon, and not more than fifty tons. The three vessels carried only 120 persons in all, Irving says it was not for want of large vessels in the Spanish port that those of Columbus were so small. He considered them better adapted to voyages of discovery, as they required but little depth of water and could therefore more easily and safely coast unknown shores and explore bays and rivers.

Cruel Husband.

A wife's complaint at a Queensland court, Australia, was that her husband, when at home, sang or whistled the same line of the same song hour after hour. The clerk agreed that that was excessive cruelty. The woman added that the previous day she locked herself in a room and pretended she was out. For three hours her husband whistled or sang the same line of the same song through the keyhole.
